Reading instruction begins with recognition of alphabet letters in both uppercase and lowercase, associating those symbols with letter names, and then associating those symbols with letters in both uppercase and lowercase, associating those symbols with recognition of alphabet letters in both uppercase and lowercase, associating those symbols with recognition of alphabet letters with their sounds. These relationships form a strong phonics foundation that, when paired with a student's developing phonemic awareness, lays the groundwork for all reading and writing skills. There are many forms of early phonics instruction. When it comes to teaching students how to write letters with fingers in sand or shaving cream, and practicing free handwriting on lined paper. As their letter-sound knowledge and basic word sense grow, they can start decoding and blending sounds to read and write basic words, often with the aid of letter tiles or magnetic letters. More complex decoding comes when they learn how letters can work in tandem to produce new sounds, such as digraphs like ch and th and diphthongs like oi and ow. The importance of mastering letters and their sound correspondences cannot be understated; it forms the basis for all language skills, from spelling to fluency to the end goal of reading comprehension. At the earliest stages, repetition and review with activities like songs, flash cards, and games are crucial.
