According to Merriam-Webster Unabridged Dictionary, in the medical field LRT stands for lower respiratory tract. The lower respiratory tract includes the trachea, bronchi, and the alveoli which make up the lungs. Each of these different structures take the oxygen that the upper respiratory pulled in, absorb it, and release carbon dioxide back out through the mouth or nose. The thoracic cage, or rib cage, and the diaphragm both support and protect the lower respiratory tract. Visible Body tells us what each of these different parts of the lower respiratory tract are functional for. The trachea is also known as the windpipe. This is the main airway for oxygen to get into our lungs. The trachea is shaped like a cylindrical tube. It is less than an inch in diameter and is covered in rings. These rings prevent the trachea from collapsing. Once the trachea reaches behind the sternum, the trachea branches off into smaller tubes called the bronchi. Upon exhalation, deoxygenated air passes back up through the trachea and out through the mouth or nose. The tubes that branch off from the trachea are called the bronchi. These get progressively smaller until they reach the lungs, which they deliver oxygenated air to. When we exhale, the deoxygenated, carbon-dioxide filled air goes ab out of the bronchi and back up the trachea. When we exercise, the bronchi expand to allow for increased airflow, while allergic reactions do the opposite. Then the air reached our lungs, which are protected inside the ribcage. One air is in the lungs, the oxygen is absorbed into our bloodstream, massing through millions of tiny sacs called alveoli into the capillaries. The alveoli exchange gases between the bloodstream and the air. Then the carbon dioxide travels in the opposite way, back from the capillaries, to the alveoli, back out the bronchi and trachea. The diaphragm is the muscle that we use to breathe. It sits at the bottom of the thoracic cavity. When we inhale, it gets smaller and moves backward, which allows the volume of the lungs to increase. This is why our abdomen pushes out when we take a deep breath. The reverse happens when we exhale. This explains why our breathing feels stunted when we get the hiccups. What else can LRT stand for?
