The shop is still open.The shop is still opened. Ah! my room was opened all week. To me, this implies that somebody is standing by the door constantly opening and closing it for a week.(The shop is still opened. I would not use this, either. Dont we use third form with is and are if the tense is in passive voice?If yes then why they are wrong. 1. Ah! my room was open all week.2. Ah! my room was opened all week. 3. The shop is still open.4. The shop is still opened. Open is an adjective qualifying room/shop. Opened is the past participle of the verb "to open" 2, and 4. make no sense. 2. = All of the time and for a week someone came to my room and opened it. 4. meaningless.If you are considering the passive, you must be able to add "by someone/something" to the end of a passive sentence: try it. Dont we use third form with is and are if the tense is in passive voice?If yes then why they are wrong. I have no idea what "third form" might mean, but your efforts are still wrong, so the answer is probably, "NO," for example The shop is opened by him.but Paulq didnt you ever see at the door of shops closed and open written on a plate to show either shop is open or closed? I know what the passive is. Of course I see shops with open and closed signs - why do you ask?What do you think examples 2, and 4. mean? I meant if shop is closed why not we use shop is opened, anyway thanks . I got it from Bob marley quote Paulq I am sorry. I am vexing you a question you asked is irritating me.Of course I see shops with open and closed signs - why do you ask?Why have not you used why did you askinstead of why do you ask ?Is this the difference between A.E and B.E? Yes, there is often a sign on the door which says OPEN on one side and CLOSED on the other, and you can turn it around after opening and before closing the shop.The point is, it says OPEN, not OPENED.In a passive sentence, "The door was opened by Fred", this tells us who opened it, or that it has been opened, and that after this happened, the door was then open.Here open is an adjective telling us the state of the door, but opened is a past participle, telling us what action took place. When you are making a statement about the state of the door/room/shop, particularly over the course of a period of time, you have to use the adjective.Oh, having just seen your later post, I see where your confusion lies. The problem is that the past participle of the verb "to close" is "closed", but the corresponding adjective of state is also "closed". That's just coincidence. Unfortunately when you see "closed" you don't know (except from context) whether it's an adjective or a participle. With "open" or "opened" you can tell the difference immediately even without context. Devour, I suggest you devour the contents of flogging a dead horse for example The shop is opened by him. You could say "opened by him every morning," but you didn't say that. but Paulq didnt you ever see at the door of shops closed and open written on a plate to show either shop is open or closed? Totally irrelevant to your original question.Furthermore, you might explain why you ask a question and then insist you already know the proper answer after being told by one or more educated, mainstream, native English speakers that you are wrong. The shop is big; the shop is white; the shop is open -> open is an adjective. open tells you about the shop. The shop is opened = someone opened the shop: opened = verb a verb tells you what has been done.There is no AE/BE difference. No, I didnt know the answer before I just saw Bob marley quote in which closed and open is used and then I made it my signature. sir please dont mind.and the question which I asked form PaulQ of the door was in the same manner to know more about use of open and closed.I am again sorry If I made anyone felt bad thanks Edinburgher and everyone Remember that the present tense is generally habitual - some thing that happens over and over.The shop is opened every day at nine. At nine o'clock every day, someone opens the shop.The shop is opened. Someone opens the shop over and over again with no indication of when or how often. Hello everyone, I see there are quite a few threads on this topic in the forum. Sorry for raising the question again, but I would like to know whether these sentences are grammatical: 1. The door has been opened all along.2. The door has been open all along.3. The door has been open all along.4. The door has long since been opened.5. The door has long since been open.6. The door has long since been open for a month.Thank you so much! Last edited by a moderator: Jun 4, 2018 Please give us some context, Wigglystuff. For example, what do you want this sentence to mean?The door has been opened/open all along. Post to the help community Get answers from community members Hi, can anyone help to let me know which is correct please?a) the counter will be open from 9am to 5pm.b) the counter will be opened from 9am to 5pm.and why please. Thank you in advance for replying, a is correct. It's open because that's what we say when a shop is open for selling stuff. I wish I could explain it better, sorry. Hello, I'm not a native English speaker, but let me post what I thought about this.a) the counter will be open from 9am to 5pm.b) the counter will be opened from 9am to 5pm. The 'open' in a) is an adjective and it tells us the situation or the state of the counter. The 'opened' in b) is an past participle and it tells us the action of the owner of the counter. And roughly speaking, the action 'open' will be achieved in an instance, the sentence b) is not a right one. So, to judge more precisely; a) suggests the state of the counter being open from 9 to 5 b) indicates they are in an effort to keep the counter open from 9 to 5.What do you say to this? a) says that the counter will be open (adjective) for eight hours -- that is, there will be eight hours during which customers can transact business at the counter. b) says that an action (namely, all the activity required to open the counter) will take place continuously for eight hours. Whether they succeed in ever getting the counter open for customers to use is not said. Presumably, during the eight hours in question, any potential customers will have to be sent away, because they are not yet open; instead, they are still in the process of opening the counter. Frankly, any business that takes eight hours to open a counter does not sound very competent, and will not be getting my business... If the sample sentence had read: b) the counter will be being opened from 9am to 5pm then GreenWhiteBlues reply in post #4 explains why it would have been incorrect. However, the sample sentence uses will be opened and a specific opening time must be stated, not a duration of time. However, the sample sentence uses will be opened and a specific opening time must be stated, not a duration of time. Moreover, even in this case.The counter will be opened at....would be much less likely thanThe counter will open at.... Hi, can anyone help to let me know which is correct please?a) the counter will be open from 9am to 5pm.b) the counter will be opened from 9am to 5pm.and why please. Sentence a) is correct, as "open" is an adjective there.Sentence b) is wrong, because "open" functions as a verb in a passive voice instead, it cannot be used for a continuous action. Thank you all for answering my question... In English grammar, the rule is, the past participle form of the verb is used after the verb 'be'. Therefore the correct is. The counter will be opened from 9 am to 5 pm. Sentence a) is correct, as "open" is an adjective there.Sentence b) is wrong, because "open" functions as a verb in a passive voice instead, it cannot be used for a continuous action. The word open is a verb. will open is simple future tense/timewill be open is NOT correctwill be opened (will be what? opened- an adjective from a verbal, a verb form (past participle form) but not verb. In English grammar, the rule is, the past participle form of the verb is used after the verb 'be'. Therefore the correct is, The counter will be opened from 9 am to 5 pm. The word open is a verb. will open is simple future tense/timewill be open is NOT correctwill be opened (will be what? opened- an adjective from a verbal, a verb form (past participle form) but not verb. Sorry, but you have made a mistake. The explanations in posts #4 and 5 are correct.Open is an adjective in every dictionary you will find. This is from the dictionary here at WRF. open - WordReference.com Dictionary of English open /opn/ adj.not closed or barred at the time mentioned:She left the windows open at night. Verbal is a verb form. There are 3 of them: Infinitive, gerund, and participle. Some verbs are not used as action but as nouns and modifiers such as adjectives:Infinitive = To open is to accept. (noun)Gerund = Opening is accepting. (noun)Participle= The counter will be opened. Opened as an adjective describes the noun counter. Therefore, opened counter. As in, not closed counter. It is an opened counter from 9 am to 5 pm. Considering the context, the context is timing, see the original sentence even has time indicator which also modifies this verb form which is a verbal an adjective. If there is no indication of time I would agree with open. I'm sorry, but this is wrong. A native speaker would not say "It is an opened counter from 9 am to 5 pm". The word "opened" is the past participle of the verb "to open" and denotes the act of somebody opening it. If you want to describe it being in a state of being "open" for a duration of time, then the word to use is 'open' and not 'opened'.[cross-posted] I have to agree. The correct answer here as previously stated is "will be open"."Will be opened" is incorrect. Can't we say "A new shop will be opened at the city centre by Alex on 5th September"? Can't we say "A new shop will be opened at the city centre by Alex on 5th September"? Tegs said (seven months ago) that "will be opened" is incorrect in that specific context. He or she did not say that the three-word sequence "will be opened" is incorrect in all contexts. It is grammatically correct in this sentence. However, it is unnatural. The active voice is better here: "Alex will open a new shop in [not 'at'] the city centre ..." Can't we say "A new shop will be opened at the city centre by Alex on 5th September"? I've certainly seen things like that: it's not actually incorrect. However it's probably more idiomatic to use the active than the passive in that sentence. (b) "the counter will be opened from 9am to 5pm" should be correct. I am a Christian. I am 58yrs. I'm also a Computer Technician. I have been studying the Bible from a child. The example I'm using is taken from the NIV Bible(which is in modern English). This Bible is edited by several people with doctorate degrees. The example of the way it should be said is stated in the verse below: Ask and it will be given to you; seek and you will find; knock and the door will be opened to you. Welcome!Your Matthew quote is fine, (of course) but it refers to the action of opening (or being opened). In the case of the counter were are describing the time interval in which it is 'open', as an adjective describing the state. A door can be opened at a particular time, while a door can be open for a period of time. 1)The shop is open.2)The shop is opened.Is there a difference between "is open" and "is opened"? Or are they interchangeably?Thank you. "opened" is the past participle of "open"so you would want to say "the shop has opened" Will open - futureOpen - presentHas opened - past BUT, in this case - Both "The shop is open" and "The shop has opened" imply the same idea, which is "Time to go shopping". Hi,I wonder why it's not good to say "The shop is opened (by someone)" since it's the passive mood." If it's in the active mood, is it wrong to say "the shop is opened"? I doubt it because it's right to say "he is gone" and "he has gone." Could someone clear up my doubt? Thanks. There's no problem with "The shop is opened (by someone)"The shop is opened at 8am by the manager. Last edited: Apr 12, 2009 Can I use the following interchangeably? 1) The shop wasn't open yesterday.2) The shop didn't open yesterday.Thanks! There doesn't seem to be much difference, though maybe in (2) you were expecting the shop to be open and it failed to open. Sentence (1) sounds somewhat more matter-of-fact. Perhaps yesterday was Sunday and that shop never opens on Sunday anyway. How about these two sentences:1) "The pizza capital of the world is Naples. The world's first pizza restaurant is opened there. It opened in 1830."2) "The pizza capital of the world is Naples. The world's first pizza restaurant is open there. It opened in 1830."A guide said this to the tourists to describe the pizza capital city and the fist pizza restaurant. I mean what word should I choose to describe the situation now: 1) "The pizza capital of the world is Naples. The world's first pizza restaurant is opened there. It opened in 1830."2) "The pizza capital of the world is Naples. The world's first pizza restaurant is open there. It opened in 1830."A guide said this to the tourists to describe the pizza capital city and the fist pizza restaurant. I think one can't correct this just by changing one word. You have to change the whole sentence a bit. Sentence number 1 would be passive in the present. (to be + past participle)In 2, "open there" isn't wrong, but not very natural. You don't want to emphasize that it's open at the time of writing, but that it's still in business. So you could say, "The world's first pizza restaurant, opened in 1830, is still doing business there."Or you could write, "The pizza capital of the world is Naples. The world's first pizza restaurant was opened there in 1830 and is still serving diners today." Does "The shop is open." is the correct way to express the idea that the shop is running it's business? Does "The shop is open." is the correct way to express the idea that the shop is running it's business? It could mean that.It could also mean, simply, that the shop physically open, but not doing business. For example, the door may be open. It could mean that.It could also mean, simply, that the shop physically open, but not doing business. For example, the door may be open. Does "The shop is open by the manager" also means the shop physically open, but not doing business. We don't say, "The shop is open by the manager." Does "The shop is open by the manager" also means the shop physically open, but not doing business. If you want to use "open" to mean "doing business", you could say it's open for business, that sounds a little formal to me however: 1)The shop is open.2)The shop is opened.Is there a difference between "is open" and "is opened"? Or are they interchangeably?Thank you. For what I understand: In: "The shop is open", open is an adjective used to simply say that you can enter the store because it's in the time they receive and serve clients (and the doors are "open" -because someone has opened them)... "The shop is open (at this time) so you can enter and ask for, or buy something..." (or whatever you want to get in for) In: "The shop is opened", "opened" is the past participle form of "open". This form (is opened) is used as the present simple passive. It focuses on the action of the store being opened; sometimes it is also said who opens it by using the preposition "by"... "The shop is opened by the owner's assistant." Another formats on which "opened" is used are perfect tenses: "The store has (been) opened." / "The store had (been) opened." / "The store could have (been) opened." / etc... One more: "opened" is also the simple past form of "open" so it is used in the active voice for the past simple..."The owner's assistant opened the store really early yesterday morning."
