One of the most important tools for that is a mobile weather app. A good weather app helps you decide if you'll need to bring an umbrella to work, or prepare for more serious conditions. With wild weather across the country, particularly hurricanes threatening coastal states, it's a good idea to check the forecast or radar for upcoming conditions. A weather app lets you do that wherever you are, whenever you like. When testing weather apps, we spent most of our time evaluating the effectiveness of their design. An ideal weather app is visually pleasing and easy to use. If you have to dig through several screens to find out when it's going to rain, the app is off to a bad start. What we didn't look for is whether or not the predicted weather came to pass. Our reasons are twofold: First, most weather apps get the bulk of their data from the National Weather Service. Some also pull their predictions from AccuWeather, or the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. The Weather Channel and a few other companies have their own predictive models, but many apps are just shells into which data flows. Second, and more importantly, to really determine the accuracy of the service's model, we'd have to perform exhaustive tests across the globe. We're simply not set up to tackle that kind of challenge. As it stands, we'll assume that if a company has invested the time and effort to create its own predictive models for something as complex as weather, then it probably knows more about meteorology than we do. For what it's worth, the apps were all quite accurate during testing. Despite earlier conspiracies, the rollout of the 5G wireless network shouldn't ruin these weather forecasts. Besides, right now you should be staying inside anyway to help curb the ongoing pandemic, even on the nicest of days. If you're really concerned about accuracy, consider getting a weather station of your own. Though weather stations are more about recording your local data than about getting forecasts, setting up and maintaining a weather station is a fun science project—just maybe not right before a hurricane hits. You may notice that Dark Sky (Opens in a new window), one of our favorite weather apps, is no longer on this list. After being acquired by Apple several years ago, Dark Sky will shut down at the end of 2022. Expect its features to get rolled into future iOS weather functionality. At first, we did not fully appreciate the sheer number of weather apps available for Android and iOS devices. In the end, we picked those we thought offered something unique, along with the most popular apps. The vast majority of these apps are free, so try them out until you find the sunniest one for you. Best Free Weather App: AccuWeather Check Stock (Opens in a new window) Its new interface may be complex, but AccuWeather has seen major improvements thanks to a recent revision. The planning features are more comprehensive, as they use weather data to help you manage allergies, safely drive, or boost productivity. We like that it includes a news section for watching videos about upcoming weather events. Platforms: Android, iOS AccuWeather (for Android) Review Best Paid Weather App: Carrot Weather See It (Opens in a new window) As long as you're willing to upgrade to its premium tier, Carrot Weather is a fine Android alternative to the soon-to-be-defunct Dark Sky. In fact, it draws from Dark Sky's own accurate weather data, while adding its own snarky flavor text. Platforms: Android, iOS Best Weather App for Android: Flowx See It (Opens in a new window) Flowx pulls from a variety of local and global sources to give Android owners the most accurate forecasts possible. If you pay for a premium tier, you can customize graphs, maps, and widgets however you like. An iOS version is in the works. Platforms: Android Best for Local Forecasts: MyRadar Weather Radar See It (Opens in a new window) Whether it's on your phone or beamed straight to your Apple Watch, MyRadar Weather Radar quickly and accurately keeps you informed about local forecasts. Dive deeper into the app to watch video content, learn aviation data, and follow wind patterns. Platforms: Android, iOS Best for Official Data: NOAA Weather Radar Live See It (Opens in a new window) Many weather apps draw data from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. So, just cut to the chase with the NOAA Weather Radar Live app. With it, you can check local forecasts and track weather patterns using interactive satellite maps. Platforms: Android, iOS Best for Air Quality Data: Plume Labs See It (Opens in a new window) Air quality is a piece of weather data that greatly impacts personal health. Even if you aren't directly caught in a wildfire, smoke-filled air can still make it dangerous to go outside. This air quality app from Plume Labs offers real-time, local pollution information, a sadly vital service in our current climate. Platforms: Android Best for Video Content: The Weather Channel See It (Opens in a new window) The newest version of The Weather Channel is a slick and capable companion. Along with hourly and daily forecasts, the app gives you the info to stay safe from both raging hurricanes and deadly viruses. The robust video section makes this app particularly useful. Platforms: Android, iOS The Weather Channel (for iPhone) Review Best Weather App for iPhone: Weather Hi-Def Radar See It (Opens in a new window) From severe weather overlays to air quality monitoring to tracking fires and lightning strikes, Weather Hi-Def Radar gives you big picture information on fascinating weather phenomena all over the world. GPS tracking and detailed data also teaches you about what's going on in your own backyard. Platforms: iOS Best Overall: Weather Underground See It (Opens in a new window) Weather Underground is no longer the darling among weather geeks; it's hard to stay radical when you're owned by IBM's The Weather Company. Community aspects are de-emphasized, data is no longer shared, and, based on anecdotes, the hyper-local predictions are less reliable. That said, the app still has plenty to offer, with smart forecasts, detailed storm tracking, air quality and temperature readings, quick links to more content on the Wunderground website, and a respectful privacy policy. Platforms: Android, iOS Weather Underground (for iPhone) Review Best for Lightning Detection: WeatherBug Check Stock (Opens in a new window) WeatherBug's performance has improved, but it's far from snappy. However, multiple new versions of the app, including Weather Elite and WeatherBug Widget, give you choices. Plus, WeatherBug's lightning-detection feature is pretty uncommon and useful. Platforms: Android, iOS WeatherBug (for Android) Review Best for Entertaining Forecasts: What The Forecast See It (Opens in a new window) If you're looking for a weather app that's unafraid to show its personality, consider What the Forecast. Severe snowstorms? Better stock up on toilet paper. The sun isn't just shining, it's shining out of your butt. If you ever lose your internet connection, the app tells you the weather in hell, which, in the long run, is probably the most useful information for most of us anyway. Platforms: Android, iOS Best for Eye Candy: Yahoo Weather See It (Opens in a new window) Yahoo Weather is a beautifully designed app that leverages other weather apps' best features—and even improves on them. Crowdsourced images from Flickr are prominently featured, and bring this app to life. It could use more radar map options, and a tool for crowdsourcing weather observations. If you don't like Weather Underground, give this one a spin. Platforms: Android, iOS Yahoo Weather (for iPhone) Review More of Our Favorite Mobile Apps Have an Android? Like Weather? Then we've got just the thing for you. And no, you don't have to practice parkour to use it. The Weather Channel® App for Android is for true weather enthusiasts who want a full view of the weather with the expertise, technology and scale of The Weather Channel. Following the recent launch of its iPhone app counterpart, the app is now available from Google Play to all users. (MORE: New App for iPhone) The app's new design and interface make it easy to use. A new social feature lets fans report your local conditions – you help improve the forecast. Since the launch of its iPhone redesign in April, The Weather Channel team has listened to users and made improvements for Android devices. “Customer feedback is so important to us, and we have listened carefully to what our iPhone team has heard to improve the Android experience,” said Kevin Doerr, senior vice president of digital products, The Weather Channel. “Not only does this app have a more streamlined view with better data, but it also has more context and crowd-sourced weather reporting.” Going beyond just a superior forecast, users can now also get the science behind the weather and the stories around it with the app, as well as multiple widget options for your home screen. The app still gives current conditions and forecasts you trust, past and future radar maps, severe Push alerts and badges for your area, the latest news and videos, and global language support.
