Things to Know Before Taking the Fursona Quiz Our furry test distinguishes the differences between the fringe and mainstream segments of the community. So, it is best to know the variations and be familiar with the definitions before taking the questionary. 1. Furry Vs. Fursona Furry is a broad term that describes both fictional anthropomorphic/feral creatures and their fans. However, a fursona is the textualized or visualized form of furries. 2. Fursuiter Vs. Non-Fursuiter Sare fans who wear a full custom to represent their persona(s). Non-fursuiters are members of the community. Being a fan does not obligate you to create your suit or become a fursuiter. Recent data shows that less than 15% of the community members own a full suit. 3. Furry Fans Vs. Others "Otherkins believe to be spiritually connected to a non-human creature." are just enthusiasts about fictional hybrid or made-up animal-like creatures. Being a member of furdom does not make you an otherkin. That is while an otherkin might decide to become a fursuiter for whatsoever reason. 4. Feral Vs. Anthro is a short form of anthropomorphic creatures which share similar features with human beings. For instance, Robin Hood (1973) is an anthro fox. But Pikachu is a feral. 5. Fursona Vs. Original Character One way to distinguish a fursona from an OC is by asking the following questions: Do you relate to that character? Do you like to have the body of that OC for the rest of your life? Do you identify yourself as what the OC represents? Does the OC demonstrate who you are? If you answered "no" to most of the above questions, you just created an OC. However, if the opposite is true, you have the chance to discover your creature's species. QuizExpo created the list research by FurScience researchers. According to their new findings, the most popular animals among the fans are as follows. Hybrid: Around 15% of the community prefers a crossbreed creature. Wolf: 13% of the fans have a wolf alter-ego. Fox: 11% of the furdom lovers prefer to have a fox persona. Dog: about 9% choose dogs are their primary fursona. Big Cats: 8.5% prefer animals like lions, tigers, panthers, etc. Dragon: 7% relate to dragon-like creatures. Mythical: 4% prefer magical creatures. Take the fursona quiz to find out which of the above groups you are in. Is There any Online Fursona Generator? In recent years, most fursona fans have become active players of this game-because it allows them to create their dream character easily. As a newbie, the first question you'll get asked at a furry meet-up is going to be "what's your species?" Most furries have an imaginary alternate self that's their "them" in the shared internet/art/fiction world of the fandom. That's a fursona. And there aren't any rules. Some people have simple fursonas: "I'm a fox!" Some have complex ones: "My character is from another planet where cat-like creatures descended from Egyptian mythology have spent years mingling with humanity, let me show you the novel I'm writing." Some fursonas they keep forever. Some change species every few years. Some have two, three, or 20 imaginary selves they use for their online avatar and in our silly shared imaginary world. They aren't always real creatures-dragons are common, impossible crossbreeds like bearcats and foxweasels are totally valid, as are bright green foxes and leopards with glowing spots. Have fun. Maybe a fursona is your ideal self-strong, brave, attractive, resourceful, reliable. Or it plays up a part of yourself that you don't get to express in the real world-sneaky, scary, predatory, powerful. In the other direction, some new furs latch onto a character like Simba or Starfox or Nick Wilde and adopt that as their fursona. It happens, but that's usually a short phase. Interestingly, if you're a fursuiter you may not want to dress like your fursona. It happens, but that's usually a short phase. cartoon character if you're still "you." If you're animal, that's a good place to start developing your fursona. If you're on the fence, haven't made up your mind, you can always say "I don't know yet," but having a fursona helps build story and community. We make jokes about silly coyotes and hungry hyenas, it's a part of our shared world, and a way to express ourselves. Give it some thought! Have you ever wondered what your furry alter ego would be? Maybe there is an animal most represents your fursona. START Fursona Test Furrydom enthusiasts believe that there are no certain restrictions to follow when it comes to creating personal fursona. Three people dressed in fursuits, representative of their respective fursonas A fursona is a personally claimed persona resembling an anthropomorphic animal adopted by a member of the furry fandom.[1][2] Fursonas can provide numerous roles for the creator. According to The New Science of Narcissism, 95% of furries have a fursona; [3]: 180 with the International Anthropomorphic Research Project estimating that the average furry has between two and three fursonas over the course of their life. [4] Some individuals' fursonas are acted out primarily online, [5] but also at furry conventions and in other public spaces. Acting out one's fursona in person may involve wearing a fursuit, a physical representation of a fursona, or pieces thereof, depending on the activity.[6][7] For example, a fursuiter may choose to wear just the head of the suit in higher temperature environments to reduce the risk of overheating. Another small minority express a desire to become, or already see themselves as, their fursona species. These people may additionally identify as therians or otherkin.[8] Main article: Furry fandom § History The term was first used in 1997.[2] According to Fred Patten, it was common for attendants to use their real names or nicknames attendents to use ConFurence (world's first furry convention) in 1989. Around the early 90s, new attendants to the convention adopted personas for roleplay; many didn't use their real names, instead using the names of their furry personas.[9] Fursonas later became commonplace in the fandom by the mid-1990s.[10] Fursonas can provide numerous roles for the creator, whether it be idealized versions of their adopter, fleshed out roleplay characters, or digital mascots.[7] Typically, furries who view the fandom more as a hobby than a lifestyle use them more as characters, or digital mascots.[7] Typically, furries who view the fandom more as a hobby than a lifestyle use them more as characters, or digital mascots.[7] Typically, furries who view the fandom more as a by adding to it. (February 2024) Despite what the name would suggest, fursonas are not restricted to furred animals and may be any animal species, [12] whether it be real, mythological, fictional, extinct, or hybrid creatures. [5] According to the Anthropomorphic Research Project, among the most common fursona species are wolves, foxes, dogs, red pandas, mustelids, marsupials, big cats, and dragons;[11][6] less common examples for fursionas include rodents, rabbits, reptiles, birds, cows, goats, cetaceans and horses;[6] furries most rarely use non-human primates as the basis for their fursiona.[11]:1 In the furry fandom, open species refer to fictional species that are freely available for anyone to use in creating their own characters.[13] An example protogen fursuit Protogens are a "cyborg alien race" created in the late 2010s.[13] Protogens became a popular species in the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a fursona.[14]:180-181 Many members of the fandom and the fandom and it is estimated 2% of furries use them as a furries use the fandom and the fandom and the fandom and the fando to create facial expressions and mouths that sync up with the fursuiter's voice.[13] Fursuit of a Dutch angel dragons (sometimes abbreviated as DADs) are species of winged dragons covered in fur who act as guardian angels.[13] Dutch angel dragons have no gender or sex.[14]: 323 The name is not related with the country of the Netherlands; rather, the name came from the creator's horse, named Dutch.[13] They are popular species in the fandom, with fursuits and thousands of art pieces on Fur Affinity.[13] Despite their popularity, a minority group of members of the fandom disapprove Dutch angel dragons' usage as a fursona due to them being viewed as trendy.[14]: 322-323 Many furries opt for real-life animal species as the basis for their characters. However, the majority state that their fursona was primarily internally generated.[17] The majority of furries also cite shared characteristic as a reason for choosing a particular species.[17] These are usually archetypal traits as ascribed to the species by humans, as opposed to actual animal behaviors.[5] Some popular fursona species are particularly strongly associated with certain traits, for example, dogs being considered 'loyal' or rabbits being considered 'promiscuous'.[17] A small minority believes that they simply have an innate connection to their chosen species.[17] A small minority believes that they simply have an innate connection to their chosen species was a past life, is a spirit guide, or that they simply have an innate connection to their chosen species.[17] A small minority believes that they simply have an innate connection to their chosen species.[17] A small minority believes that they simply have an innate connection to their chosen species.[17] A small minority believes that they simply have an innate connection to their chosen species.[17] A small minority believes that they simply have an innate connection to the simply have an innate connection to with the experiences of otherkin and shapeshifting.[17] Furries often take a long time to decide on their fursona.[7] 25 to 50% of furries surveyed have had more than one concurrently.[17] Furries with multiple fursonas usually do not see them as representing multiple selves, but facets of the same self, possibly related to how they express themselves in different social contexts.[5] Additionally, the characteristics of a fursona may change over time along with its owner.[7][5][12] This is usually in personality, but species may change as well.[5] Just as art is central to the furry fandom in general it also plays a critical role in the creation and representation of fursonas. Furries who are not artistic themselves may commission artwork of their fursona from other members of the fandom as part of the creation process.[5] Jake Dunn argues that a furry's fursona cannot be separated from their own sense of self, and many furries in fact see the performance of their fursona as a way of being their 'truest' self.[5] On average, furries rate their fursonas higher on all dimensions of the big five personality traits. They view their fursonas as having more desirable traits than they do, and fewer undesirable traits. They view their fursonas higher on all dimensions of the big five personality traits. idealized versions of their owners.[17][12][11] Projecting this idealized self can ease social tensions and reduce social anxiety.[12] Dunn also argues that the most common idealized traits given to fursonas are also considered ideal by society at large,[5] S. E. Roberts et al. hypothesize that to some, fursonas serve as a safe way to explore traits that are socially undesirable.[18] Furries are often highly concerned with their fursona being unique. When they deem that their fursona has been 'copied', their sense of self may be threatened.[19] Furries are often highly concerned with their fursona being unique. their gender and presentation,[12] and some fursonas have a different gender, age, or sexual orientation than that of their creator.[5] In a 2016 study concerning the negotiation and performance of identities by the furry community, multiple research participants emphasized the importance of costuming and fursonas in exploring one's gender identity or sexual orientation.[20] Transgender furries with a sense of gender identity and generalized identity that does not match their physical appearance or sex assigned at birth frequently possess a fursona or fursonas that present their idealized selves. Similar situations exist for those with other kinds of body dysphoria and related struggles [citation needed] Ponysona ^ a b "Words We're Watching: 'Furry' and 'Fursona'". Merriam-Webster. Anthropomorphic creatures have always been an undeniable part of sci-fi and fiction. However, people started to relate to such characters when the internet became more accessible. That is because, before the internet, it was relatively hard for furdom fans to come out—as it sounds like a taboo or strange idea. However, people have created fursona communities since the 80s. And now, you can find large groups of fursuiters all around the world. Things to Know Before Taking the Fursona Quiz Our furry test distinguishes the differences between the fringe and mainstream segments of the community. So, it is best to know the variations and be familiar with the definitions before taking the Fursona Quiz Our furry Vs. Fursona Furry is a broad term that describes both fictional anthropomorphic/feral creatures and their fans. However, a fursona is the textualized form of furries. 2. Fursuiter Sare members of the community who do not own any custom/suit or own paraphernalia instead. You do not have to have a furry persona to become a part of the community. Being a fan does not obligate you to create your suit or become a fursuiter. Recent data shows that less than 15% of the community members own a full suit. 3. Furry Fans Vs. Others "Otherkins believe to be spiritually connected to a non-human creature." Some also think they have been an animal or mythical creature in their previous life. However, furry fans are just enthusiasts about fictional hybrid or made-up animal-like creatures. Being a member of furdom does not make you an otherkin. That is while an otherkin might decide to become a fursuiter for whatsoever reason. 4. Feral Vs. Anthro Feral in furridom is a term that describes animals or creatures that do not resemble humans. But Anthro is a short form of anthropomorphic creatures which share similar features which from an OC is by asking the following questions: Do you relate to that character? Do you like to have the body of that OC for the rest of your life? Do you identify yourself as what the OC represents? Does the OC demonstrate who you are? If you answered "no" to most of the above questions, you just created an OC. However, if the opposite is true, you are? If you answered "no" to most of the above questions, you just created an OC.
