Office furniture, equipment and supplies are often listed as individual line items in a an office budget. When extra money is leftover at the end of the year in a particular line item, those funds are the first to be reduced or eliminated during budget cuts. It's important to research office furniture design, office equipment durability and office supply discounts so that you can best utilize all of your allocated budget under specific line items before the end of the fiscal year. The term office furniture comprises furniture that is part of the office's design and includes all large furnishings, such as desks, tables, chairs and book shelves. These large items generally cost hundreds or thousands of dollars per item and last a minimum of five years. The budget for office furniture can be inconsistent, because most of an office's furniture expenses are budgeted into the company's start-up costs. Depending on the company's needs, the office furniture budget can be drastically reduced in the following year or two. Although some major office furnishings may need to be replaced every twenty years, high-quality office furniture may never need to be replaced. Well-designed and functional furniture can increase a worker's productivity and enthusiasm, meaning that an investment in office furniture is often an investment in the company's image. Office equipment is a functional or mechanical item used to facilitate production in the office, such as a fax or copier machine. Less expensive items, such as staplers, are generally classified as office supplies. The contemporary office requires an abundance of office equipment. As of 2010, basic office equipment included a computer for each employee, and a printer and scanner are commonly used in each office space. More advanced office equipment might include a fingerprint or eye scanner, high-tech digital cameras or video recorders, and video conferencing equipment, including a flat screen projector. Office equipment may need to be replaced more often than office furniture, particularly as new technology is debuted and utilized. The more important the office equipment's function is to the office, the more often it will need to be replaced. Office equipment which faces more wear and tear from daily and consistent use, such as a company laptop or cell phone, will have a shorter lifespan and greater maintenance cost. Office equipment maintenance and repair costs should be a separate line item from the office equipment allocation. General office supplies include all of the items necessary to run the office. Small office equipment, such as staplers and tape dispensers, can also be purchased under this line item. The main office supply cost might include reams of paper, printed forms and documents, sticky notes and notepads. All expendable items, such as pens, pencils, highlighters and all writing supplies, also fall into this category. Office supplies must continuously be replenished because of their mobility and disposability. It's often difficult to account for all of the small items, particularly when the office utilizes an open supply cabinet. Pay close attention to the weekly inventory and invoice sheets. Look at the items which exhaust the majority of your office supply budget and shop around. You can easily reduce your spending and increase your savings by researching the best prices. Used office furniture can be sold in a short period of time with the right tools. Traditionally, office furniture classified ads have been placed in local newspapers. You could also contact a business that will purchase the furniture directly from you and resell the items. Lastly, office furniture ads can be placed online through websites such as craigslist.org. Local papers sell classified ad space at different prices. For example, the Los Angeles Times sells print and online space at different rates, though you can access additional information online. The website even allows users to place their ad online—whether print, online or both. The Miami Herald has representatives that will design ads (1-866-860-6000), or you can create your own ad using their self-serve website. Most local newspapers across the nation offer similar services. However, the turnaround time from when you place an ad to when the used furniture sells may be longer than if you had used other ways. Businesses exist that directly purchase used office furniture and later sell the items independently. Services, such as Furniture Finders, list various dealers located throughout the United States that will purchase used furniture. SWC Office Furniture is an example of a business that buys used furniture in the Connecticut, New York, New Jersey and Massachusetts area. You can also contact furniture liquidators that will purchase furniture or arrange to advertise and sell the furniture, usually by charging a fee and a percentage of the profits. Officefurnitureliquidators.com works within the Maryland and Delaware area; conklinoffice.com is in the New York, New Jersey and Massachusetts area; and abettersource.com is in the San Francisco Bay area. An easy way to sell office furniture is to take photos of the inventory and upload the photos onto a craigslist ad. Unlike similar websites such as ebay, purchases on craigslist are primarily made by local residents. While shipping costs should not be a factor, make sure that the ad specifies if the buyer is responsible for delivery or if you are willing to deliver the furniture. Consider whether you want to answer every prospective buyer's questions or if you want to hold an open house or garage sale, perhaps during the weekend, so that many buyers can inspect the furniture simultaneously. To avoid answering several telephone calls about the furniture, do not provide a contact number. Highlight that all sales are final in the ad as well as on any receipt, if applicable. cad block office furniture free download
