

I'm not a robot

百度知道>提示信息 知道宝贝找不到问题了> > <slightly hungry) That site is great, Art! I would say: I'm hungry. I'm as hungry as a horse. I'm starved. My stomach's growling. I can't think of many more than that at the moment . . . Brilliant -- I correct a spelling error while not carefully proofreading my own text -- geez! I'm starving. I'm famished. My tummy's rumbling. I could eat for three. May I suggest the following... (such is the English language some or all of the following may only apply to the UK, London, or my part of London) 1) I am Hank Marvin (From cockney Rhyming slang Hank Marvin = Starving) 2) I'm Hungry (F*cking hungry) 3) I could eat a horse and chase the jockey 4) I could eat a baby's arse through a wicker chair (my personal favourite) 5) My stomach thinks my throat has been cut 6) I am dropping through (I cannot elaborate as to what is dropping through what) 7) I am ravished (note this is frequently misdelivered by hungry East London girls and comes out as "I'm ravishing") M 3 b) I could eat a horse between two breadvans. I'm as hungry as a bear. I'm ravenous. I've also heard these: I'm so hungry that I could eat... a cow grass. dirt. nails. A meagre contribution, you seem to have it covered Back home in Australia, its very common in my region to hear someone say "I'm so hungry I could eat the crutch out of a low flying duck" I'm ravenous. I'm dying of hunger/starvation. I've got the munchies. [= cannabis-related] Last edited: Jun 25, 2009 I often hear "I'm dying of the hunger" around my way. I often say "I'm going to gnaw off an arm" but with my accent it comes out something like "I'm gonna nora fanarm" and NOBODY from overseas ever understands what I've said, so one to avoid probably "Aah cud eight a scabby donkey". In Barbados we say, "My belly is touching my back." (Portraying the image of the belly being so sunken in from hunger that it is meeting the back) "My stomach is on 'E'." ('E' for empty, as in the typical gas tank)
