I have a little trouble understanding when to use "check" in different contexts. I've seen it said that you can check by someone, but also check with someone or something. Is all these options correct? You can indeed use "check with someone or something." Is all these options correct? You can indeed use "check with someone or something." Is all these options correct? Is all the you can indeed use "check with someone or something." It is all the you can indeed use "check with someone or something." It is all the you can indeed use "check with some or some or this document using a tool?" However, I'm not sure if "check by" is always allowed, as it might sound a bit unusual. What do you think? In general, context helps a lot in understanding when to use each option. For instance, if someone checks their car's oil levels, they're checking with the car (and possibly using a tool), but if a buyer inspects a house, they're checking by a professional inspector or by themselves, not necessarily "with" them. If I say "the house was checked with an inspector". But what about "checked with/by a tool"? That's also possible in certain situations! You can check out of a hotel when you leave, but if someone is cured and leaving the hospital, that would be called being discharged. If you decide to leave the hospital on your own, without waiting for official discharged yourself. People usually wait to be released from the hospital, so it's not like you can just "check out" whenever. The context of this conversation is a comic book where a hero saves someone and says to their brother "Check her out tomorrow, or else it'd be a waste of money". It seems that in this scenario, being discharged from the hospital don't know about the hero's powers. EDIT: I see what you mean now - if the brother wants to take her home, he would indeed need to discharge her officially, not just "check out" and assume she's cured. So in this context, it does seem like an act of self-activation, rather than just waiting for someone else to do it. The patient is released from the hospital, which means the doctor has decided that the patient's care is finished and authorized them to leave. In Spanish, this process is known as "dar de baja." However, the patient cannot depart until they have "checked out," a procedure that involves paying any outstanding charges at the hospital cashier. If the patient had submitted a credit card upon admission, it's still necessary for them to check out with the cashier to obtain a final copy of their bill. Checking out is an essential step in leaving the hospital, as patients should pay all outstanding fees before they can leave. This process allows hospitals to settle their accounts and ensures that patients are not discharged until all debts have been settled. A user mentioned coming across sentences like "Perhaps the most elegant solution is to check for the sign of the sum and compare it against the signs of the numbers added." The meaning behind these phrases seemed clear, but the user questioned whether "to check" alone would suffice. One respondent suggested that "for the sign" functions as an adverbial phrase, indicating what or where to check. This interpretation implies that "for" is associated with a specific object or condition rather than being part of the verb itself. Another user added that "to check for mistakes in my essay?* Please check my card; it may contain spelling mistakes. To clarify the usage of these phrases, another user pointed out that "check for" often involves looking for something's existence or presence, whereas "check" implies reviewing or examining an item. The correct choice between these options depends on the context in which they are used. In British English, a different phrasing is preferred: instead of saying "write me," one should say "write to me." This reflects regional variations in language usage and might influence how sentences like the original example are constructed. A moderator stepped in to offer their perspective, stating that while "write me" may seem informal, it's not necessarily incorrect. The decision to include or omit the preposition "to" often depends on personal preference, regional dialect, or specific writing styles. The conversation highlights the communicating with others. Can you please check for grammatical mistakes in my essay? When using phrases like "check if" or "check if" that," we need to consider what's being implied - whether a specific outcome is anticipated. In scenarios where a particular outcome is expected, it's often better to use 'check that,' as it conveys the idea of confirming a certain result. This is evident in instances like checking if the elevator isn't moving; here, 'check that' suggests verifying that the expected condition (the elevator not moving) holds true. However, when no specific outcome is anticipated, phrases like "check if" are more suitable. This subtle distinction may seem nuanced, but it's essential for conveying the intended meaning in various contexts.
