

Click Here

Republicans think Devon Archer might help them get more information out of their investigation into President Joe Biden's family, and they're making a big deal about his closed-door testimony before the House Oversight Committee. Who is Devon Archer, anyway? He's someone who knows Hunter Biden, the president's son, from past business dealings in Ukraine and China. They met through a friend at Yale, and Archer helped Hunter get involved with some shady companies abroad. One of these companies was Burisma, which paid Hunter $166,666 per month for his work - he got that much while Archer got the same amount for himself! Archer also made deals for them in China, including introducing one businessman to President Biden during a trip in 2013. Devon Archer is now testifying behind closed doors as Republicans scrutinize his connections to the president and his son. He's had some legal trouble of his own, getting convicted on tax charges in 2018, but that's not stopping them from using him as a way to dig deeper into their investigation. Devon Archer's Voluntary Interview Sparks Controversy Over President Trump's Pardon A former business partner of Hunter Biden, Devon Archer was convicted of participating in a scheme to defraud a Native American tribe. Archer's conviction was overturned and reinstated before being sentenced to one year in prison. In a voluntary interview with the Republican-led House Oversight Committee, Archer shared his side of the story, claiming he was a victim of financial fraud. The committee's questions focused on the Biden family businesses, with Archer portraying President Biden as not directly involved in their dealings. His testimony sparked a heated debate over potential impeachment proceedings against the president. In response to criticism, Archer stated that he answered all questions honestly and completely. President Trump recently pardoned Archer, citing "very unfair" treatment. The pardon has reignited controversy surrounding the Biden family businesses and Hunter Biden's convictions. The Biden family's financial dealings are at the center of an ongoing investigation, and one key figure in this saga is Devon Archer. Despite initially agreeing to testify, he has rescheduled his appearance four times, fueling speculation about his motives. Devon's connections to powerful individuals, including John Kerry's stepson Christopher Heinz, raise questions about whether he's related to the former Secretary of State. The Bidens' influence in American politics could be a factor in Devon's situation. Devon's own family background is noteworthy - he comes from a middle-class Long Island-based family, with his parents being an art teacher and a Vietnam vet. His business partnership with Hunter Biden, whom he met at Yale University, has been under scrutiny due to their involvement in various financial dealings. Devon has had run-ins with the law before, including a 2018 conviction for selling bonds and securities to a Native American tribe, resulting in a prison sentence. However, his lawyers attempted to appeal this conviction, which was ultimately rejected. Devon's chance at avoiding his sentence now lies in providing "substantial assistance" to authorities, potentially implicating others in the process. As Devon prepares to testify on July 31, it remains unclear what information he will reveal and how it might impact the investigation into the Biden family's finances. Some experts have pointed out that several key witnesses and sources accusing Joe Biden of corruption are themselves facing legal troubles or fugitives from justice. Devon Archer's repeated cancellations have raised suspicions about his intentions to cooperate with Congress. A subpoena was issued by Chairman James Comer on June 12, yet he has yet to take the stand. With the Committee set to go on recess in August, time is running out for Archer to finally testify. The panel's spokesman confirmed that he will be rescheduled to appear on July 31, but it remains unclear whether he'll actually show up and face questioning.

Who is related to who in the archers. Devon archer net worth. Who does archer end up with. Devon archer. Devon archer actor. Devon archet.